

Abstract: According to the conceptualist view in the philosophy of perception, we must possess concepts for all the various objects, properties, and relations which feature in our perceptual experiences. The question with which my talk is concerned is: can one show that the conceptualist view is false by showing that we do not consciously attend to all such objects properties and relations?